

LENNON, WEINBERG, INC.

514 West 25th Street, New York, NY 10001 Tel. 212 941 0012 Fax. 212 929 3265
info@lennonweinberg.com www.lennonweinberg.com

Melissa Meyer

Yau, John. "Weekend Studio Visit: Melissa Meyer in Midtown Manhattan, New York" Hyperallergic, December 15, 2013.

<http://hyperallergic.com/98147/weekend-studio-visit-melissa-meyer-in-midtown-manhattan-new-york/>

HYPERALLERGIC

Sensitive to Art & its Discontents

Weekend Studio Visit: Melissa Meyer in Midtown Manhattan, New York

by John Yau on December 15, 2013

Melissa Meyer, "Desto" (2013)

At some point, while sitting in Melissa Meyer's studio, and talking about artists and shows that we admired, such as the calligraphic paintings of Bradley Walker Tomlin, we discovered that we had both been moved by Jean Dubuffet, The Last Years, the opening exhibition of the newly renovated Jeu de Palme, Paris, in 1991. In his last paintings — which were also recently featured in the Pace exhibition, Jean Dubuffet: The Last Two Years (January 20–March 10, 2012) — Dubuffet stopped depicting figures segmented into black-outline shapes, and started painting free-floating colors and forms with a new freedom.

This was why I had come to Meyer's studio. Over the past decade, Meyer, rightfully characterized by David Cohen "as virtually without a peer as a lyrical abstractionist," moved from the lyrical to the disjunctive. She literally gave up what she knew how to do so well, which was to loop thick, juicy brushstrokes of oil paint slowly and elegantly — like a brightly dressed ice skater — across a canvas surface. I first wrote about this change in her work in The Brooklyn Rail (March 2009) and wanted to follow up. I was not disappointed.

In order to effect this change, which transpired between 2001 and 2003, Meyer made a number of decisions, all of which impacted her practice. She began making watercolors, which led her to thin her oil paint to a more liquid consistency. This was followed by a commission for two huge murals (one is forty feet high and the other is sixty feet long) for the Shiodome City Center in Tokyo, which led Meyer to begin using Photoshop as a compositional aid.

Literally speaking, the commission got her to think about breaking up the field across which her lush brushstrokes once unfurled unimpeded. While working on the commission she became interested in discontinuity, perhaps because she knew that a brushstroke that moved unbroken across a sixty foot surface would be the wrong kind of supreme fiction as well as a denial of her own physical engagement with the medium.

Front door of Melissa Meyer's studio

In her recent work Meyer initially creates a patchwork ground of different-sized rectangles: white, pale yellow, pink, green and cantaloupe-colored. Using these grounds as bordered areas — the opposite of Dubuffet — Meyer draws linear glyphs, usually in darker colors than the grounds. The line may exceed the ground's borders, but never by very much.

Using oil paint diluted to the consistency of watercolor (or dirty turpentine) requires that Meyer lay the painting flat on the ground. Otherwise, the paint would drip and run, which the artist clearly doesn't want. In 2009, when I reviewed her show at Lennon, Weinberg, Inc., where she will open an exhibition of these new paintings next month (January 9–February 15, 2014), the yellows in the ground were brighter, sharper and sunnier. In the new work, the grounds are paler and — more importantly — she has moved from mere cacophony to courting the anarchic.

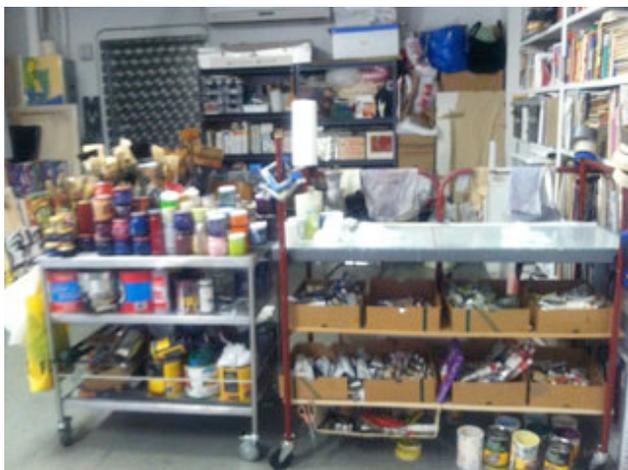

Melissa Meyer, "Inky" (2013)

In "Inky" (2013), the ground's rectangles are abutted together; its irregular, patchwork grid consists of pale yellows and cantaloupe, yellow-greens, and pale greens. Over this she has drawn with brushes of varying widths. The lines range from translucent gray to deep violet, from dry to wet, and from thin to relatively thick. Some lines bleed. There are sharp angles and rounded curves — triangles, circles and rectangles. You have to pick them out. While "Inky" is all of a piece, it doesn't add up to an over-all pattern or pictorial image. Each part calls for attention, presses one to look more closely.

In "Inky" and other recent works in the studio, looking becomes an act of registering distinctions, ruptures, and changes of different kinds, each of which imbues a line with a particular identity. No two are alike, however similar they might initially appear.

The strength of Meyer's recent paintings is that no matter what associations they stir up — and there are many — they don't become diluted in the looking, don't become abstractions of something else, a landscape or a building's facade, for example. I think this is the hardest and most elusive place for art of any kind to occupy — the place that resists characterization and naming, the literal. It is — in the current situation — that not well-regarded place Walter Pater pointed to when he wrote, "all art constantly aspires towards the condition of music." I don't believe Pater meant that art should be elitist or pure; rather, he was opposed to both the symbolic and literal — anything content to occupy the realm of discursive explication — which in this day and age ranges from the kitschy to the theoretical.

Interior of Melissa Meyer's studio

when she painted "Inky" and other works, but I also don't think it was something she suppressed or forgot.

At the same time, I was reminded that Meyer lived for many years in Tribeca, and that her place was on the sixth floor, facing the World Trade Center. She could see the twin towers from her front hall and, as she later told me, saw the second plane go over her building. I don't think 9/11 was foremost in her mind

One could make a connection between the destruction of the towers and her recent paintings, but that would be reductive and rather simplistic. Still, the association, however faint, is there. And it is that faintness, that smoldering awareness that lurks in our thoughts — like a spark waiting to bloom — which I find so powerful.

Melissa Meyer, "Do Si Do" (2013)

None of us are ever that far away from the nothingness that awaits us all.

In her earlier work, the viewer could visually and viscerally grasp Meyer's desire for the sensual and the lucid, for optimism and light. During the last decade, she has crossed a threshold. The calligraphic glyphs are a visual stammer poised on the edge of, but never sliding into, the inchoate.

Meyer's paintings are meditations on mortality. Rather than offering solace or transcendence, they inform us that change and disintegration are all that stand between us and what we call "infinity." This is the beauty and pain that Meyer has gotten in her work. It is further proof why abstract art remains powerful.

LENNON, WEINBERG, INC.

514 West 25th Street, New York, NY 10001 Tel. 212 941 0012 Fax. 212 929 3265
info@lennonweinberg.com www.lennonweinberg.com

Melissa Meyer

Corio, Paul. "Seen In New York, January 20, 2014" Abstract Critical, February 3, 2014.
<http://abstractcritical.com/article/seen-in-new-york-january-2014/>

abstract critical

3 February 2014

Seen In New York, January 2014

Written by Paul Corio

Devlin, 2013, 70 x 80", oil on canvas

Melissa Meyer's painting occupies a space in between gestural abstraction and calligraphy; it's neither and both. More importantly, she can make a mark that seems like a natural occurrence – there isn't a single contrived curlycue among all the ribbon-like strokes in her current solo show at Lennon Weinberg, and if it looks that easy it invariably means it took years to hone. The paintings have all of the most appealing qualities of watercolor, especially transparency, but with a scale and color saturation that isn't available in that medium. The stand-out for me was the large-scale Devlin, nearly 7' across – it looked like a huge watercolor that had its color intensified in Photoshop, with oranges and reds that glowed like stained glass.

LENNON, WEINBERG, INC.

514 West 25th Street, New York, NY 10001 Tel. 212 941 0012 Fax. 212 929 3265
info@lennonweinberg.com www.lennonweinberg.com

Melissa Meyer

Rhodes, David. "Risk on the Horizon: Melissa Meyer at Lennon, Weinberg" Artcritical, February 9, 2014.

<http://www.artcritical.com/2014/02/09/david-rhodes-on-melissa-meyer/>

artcritical

the online magazine of art and ideas

Risk on the Horizon: Melissa Meyer at Lennon, Weinberg

by David Rhodes

Melissa Meyer: Recent Work at Lennon, Weinberg, Inc.

January 9 to February 15, 2014

514 West 25th Street, between 10th and 11th avenues

New York City, 212-941-0012

Smokey, 2013, 60 x 84", oil on canvas

As a vehicle for combining color and light there is no better material means in painting than watercolor. Its properties are well documented, though that doesn't diminish, in the right hands, its capacity to surprise. Willem de Kooning was well-acquainted with its particular qualities, valuing both its subtlety and its capacity for directness; the medium fit well with his desire for a spontaneity capable of conflating lived life and studio practice. It seems this is something equally appealing to Melissa Meyer who has achieved it, arguably, without the associated drama of abstract expressionist ways. While choosing to pass on that generation's angst, Meyer continues a tradition of abstraction without foregrounding personal struggle—which isn't to say she in any way takes it easy. As Mary Heilmann said of her own work, there is no need to "Duke it out" with paintings as Ab-Ex artists once appeared to do. The difficulties and challenges of painting are not eschewed, as they are not necessarily a correlative of a combative or risk-filled life. As Larry Poons said, risks are better taken in painting than when crossing the road.

This exhibition, Meyer's third at Lennon, Weinberg, makes the best possible use of a relatively narrow space that affords views of considerable distance from front to back. Groups of works encompass a range of temperature from black and white works on paper made in 2012, through paintings like Little Smokey, 2013, that evince a relatively austere range of color, to the painting Shuffle, 2013 which is warm and expansive. Little Smokey, 2013, is a horizontal diptych whose lateral emphasis recalls the proportions of Cinemascope, an apposite association in view of the artist's long-standing interest in cinema. The bluish-black and violet brushed tracks have a calligraphic quality, but they are not writing per se or distinct pictograms, and describe a dry melt of turns and curves that speed up and slow down in bursts. Their episodic yet linked characteristics enfold an idea of the uneven flow of time rather as cinema can vary pace through editing. These separate yet always active passages imply and dismantle an idea of the grid using askew rectangular sections that establish an irregular and constantly changing pulse. The saturated or pale yellow, pink and off white areas join the energized armature in leaving only brief pauses for the eye to halt until continuing helter-skelter (think also of the Beatles song of the same name). Chinese landscape painting and the sculptures of David Smith both come to mind, though here any comparisons are made with the understanding that a thorough reinvention has taken place. The changes of illumination and contrast made possible by the under-painting pull what might otherwise be a very frontal composition into a torqued, flickering, pulsing set of loosely-defined spaces that recalls the coexistence of disparate spaces and scale changes in Chinese 18th-century painting.

Devlin, 2013, 70 x 80", oil on canvas

There are three paintings that share the same chromatic range as Little Smokey and are placed in the same area of the gallery that nonetheless diverge in subtle, exploratory ways. In the larger Smokey, (2013) the change in scale of the mosaic of compartments and the reduced contrast as well as the blurring through washed color implies changes of focus amidst a sweeping, undulating pattern of light. Meyer achieves contrast from one painting to the other though shifts in color and structure, ever mindful of the potential of discordant and disjunctive means. These means, nevertheless, unexpectedly cohere whilst not submitting to stasis. In Devlin, (2013) for example, a painting of contrasting lushly warm and sharply cool colors, there is no predictable sequence yet overlapping and always extending riffs somehow don't fall apart thanks to an implied melody.

With Meyer, drawing and painting play an equal role in generating her linear element – and she cannot be accused of forsaking either in not separating them. An arabesque can remain just that or it can thicken and double to become a shape. Other times areas of color are drawn over or partially cancelled out, the choice constantly varying. When it comes to her consideration of composition, spontaneity would appear to win out over structure because the hand is ahead of thought. But there is no attendant loss of control as experience clearly informs the hand as much as it does thought. A painting always happens over a period of time: it is a time-based medium after all, a fact of which Meyer's approach makes a virtue by repeatedly elapsing one painterly moment or relationship into the next, simultaneously exposing the process and allowing it to run backwards and forwards for the viewer. There is always discovery in Meyer's paintings, even when there are clear horizons to head towards.

LENNON, WEINBERG, INC.

514 West 25th Street, New York, NY 10001 Tel. 212 941 0012 Fax. 212 929 3265
info@lennonweinberg.com www.lennonweinberg.com

Melissa Meyer

Wilkin, Karen. "At the Galleries" The Hudson Review, Spring 2014, pp.112-113.

KAREN WILKIN

At the Galleries

At Lennon, Weinberg, Inc., Melissa Meyer's bold new paintings and watercolors, made over the past two years, reminded us that she, like Poons, proceeds from an acute awareness of her surroundings, wedded to a thorough understanding of the implications of Modernism, to arrive at lively, personal abstractions. Meyer refines a host of visual suggestions into glyph-like calligraphic gestures, disciplined by the almost subliminal presence of a generously scaled grid. Each painting had a particular mood, quality of light, and temperature, a function of variations in color, density, scale, and in the character of the "glyphs," which are as individual and spontaneous as handwriting, now cursive and fluid, now angular and abrupt.

Meyer's compositions begin with large blocks of color, often, in her recent work, in hues so pale and evanescent that we can doubt that we are seeing them. The overscaled drawing, in various colors, that overlies the generating blocks, can be layered or sparse, tangled or orderly, expansive or compressed, complex and knotted, transparent or crisp, or spare and geometric. While the generating grid sometimes declares itself forcefully in some paintings, in others, the energy of any given "glyph" appears to have affected everything around it, constraining drawing incidents to spread, elongate, or compress. Alterations in the density of the fabric of gestures further change our relationship to these paintings, determining whether we read the grid of glyphs as a single, inflected, confrontational plane or attempt to plunge through layers of drawing to explore fictive depths.

The biggest surprises in the recent show were a group of large, near-monochrome canvases built of dark calligraphic gestures of various weights on white grounds that, on first acquaintance, seemed as restrained as Meyer's black-and-white works on paper. Almost immediately, though, transparent greys, some tending towards brown or purple, declared themselves, reinforcing the shifts in clarity and width among the glyphs. Similarly, faint tinges of unimaginably delicate color beneath the drawing began to animate the grounds of these seemingly graphic, straightforward pictures. The longer we looked, the more there was to see. Equally provocative was Devlin, 2013, a large, squarish canvas with mouth-puckering oranges made more acidic by the proximity of brushy reds tending to purples, citrus yellows, and saturated blues. At once densely layered and airy, Devlin was distinguished by loose, dark calligraphy that suggested trajectories through space, like the paths we mentally trace in classical Chinese landscape painting. Both this painting and the tantalizing monochromes pointed to new directions for Meyer. Deeply satisfying as her recent works are, they also make us eager to see what happens next.

LENNON, WEINBERG, INC.

514 West 25th Street, New York, NY 10001 Tel. 212 941 0012 Fax. 212 929 3265
info@lennonweinberg.com www.lennonweinberg.com

Melissa Meyer

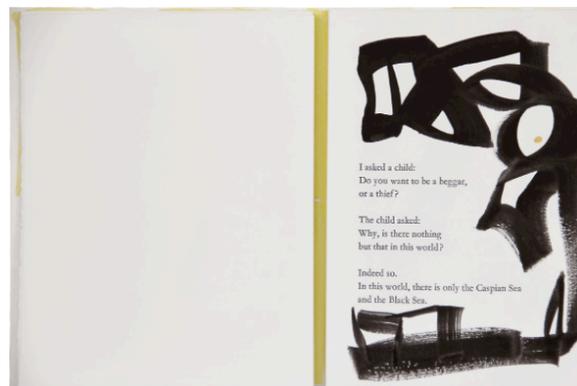

Butler, Sharon. "Melissa Meyer's FASCINATION" Two Coats of Paint, October 9, 2014.
<http://www.twocoatsofpaint.com/2014/10/melissa-meyers-fascination.html>

SHARON BUTLER TWO COATS OF PAINT

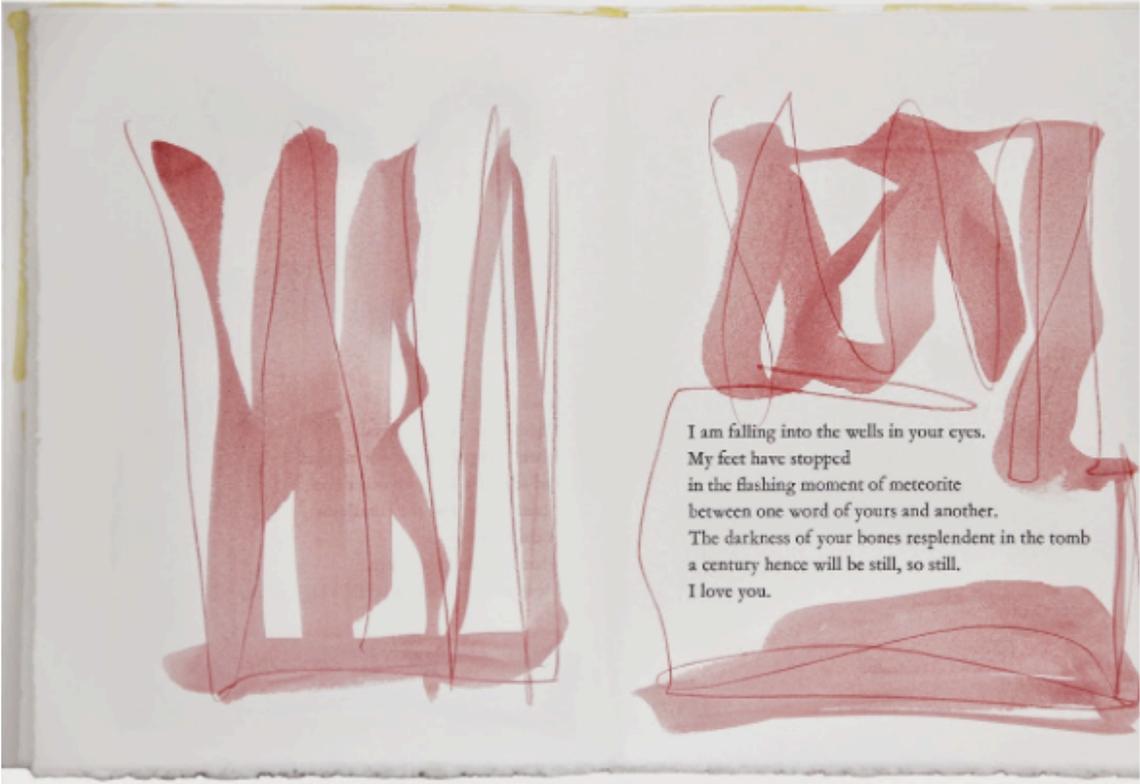

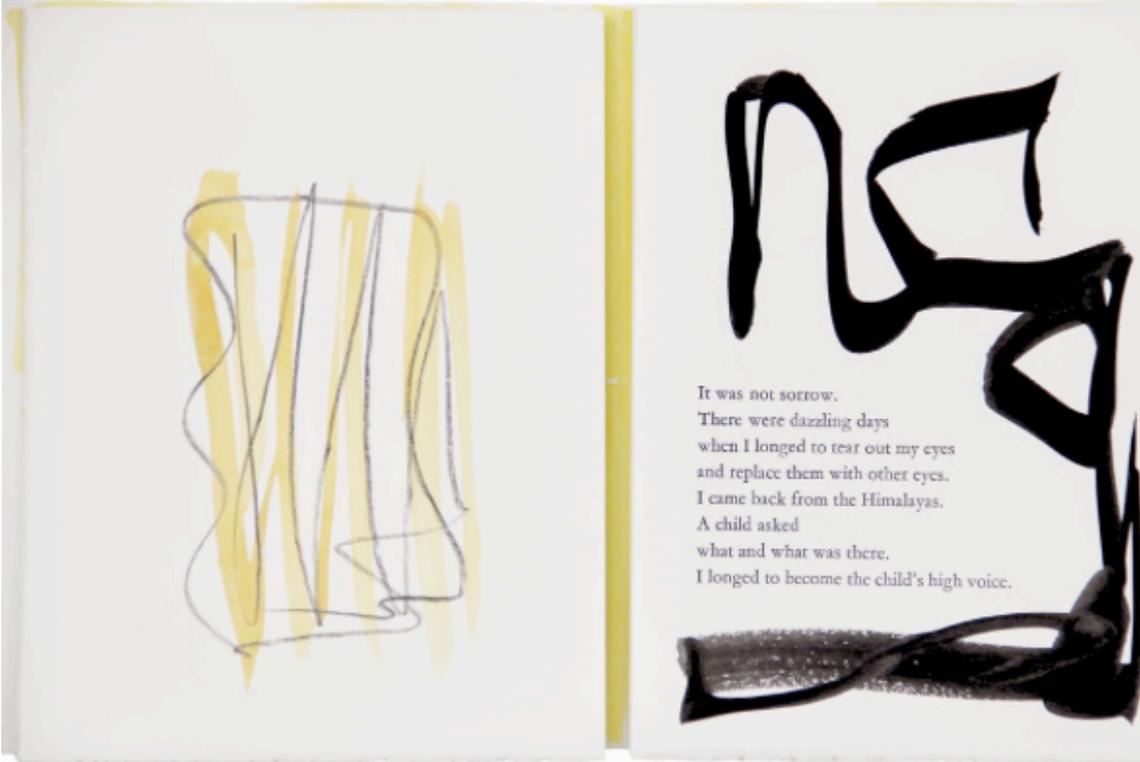

Melissa Meyer's FASCINATION

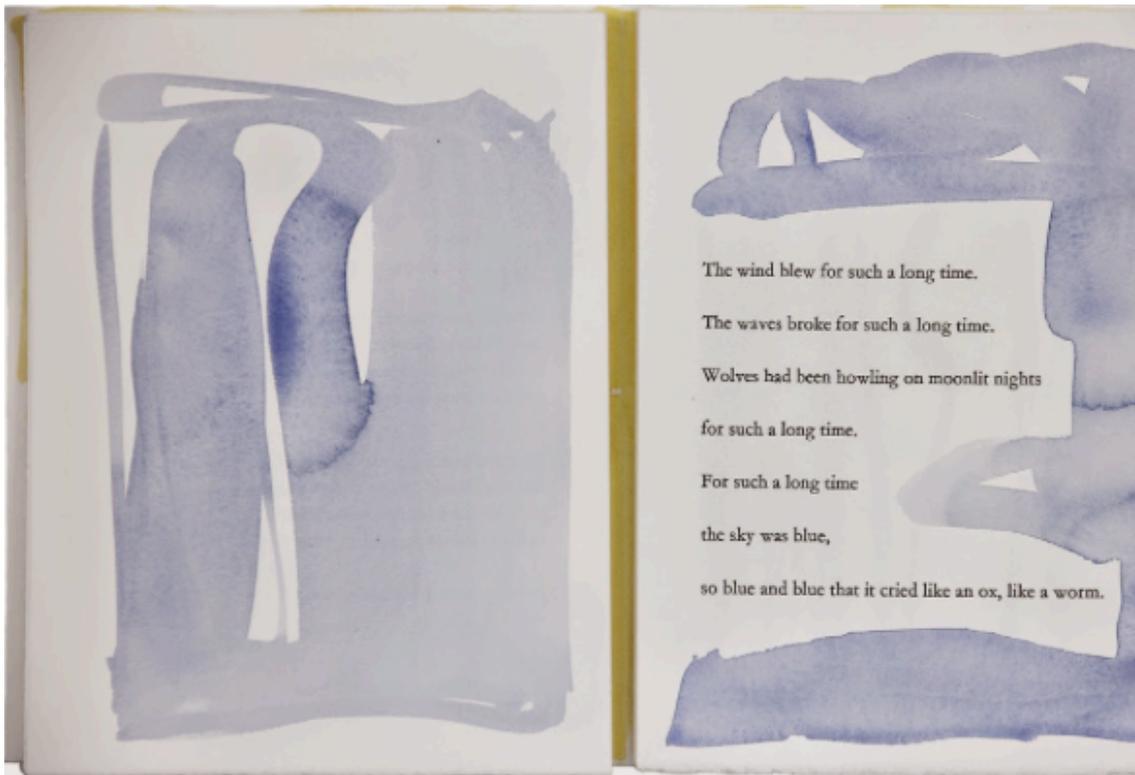

Over the summer Melissa Meyer and I exchanged leisurely studio visits, first at my studio in DUMBO and then at hers on West 39th Street. On the second floor of an unassuming office building in the fabric district, Meyer's space has a timeless view of a bustling Manhattan street that reminded me of paintings by Ashcan School artists like Robert Henri, John Sloan, and George Luks. She had just returned from a long residency at Yaddo, where she completed Fascination, a letterpress book project (pictured above) that featured poems by South Korean poet and activist Ko Un.

The project was conceived by French artists' book publisher Gervais Jassaud. Jassaud invited several artists to create artwork alongside Un's poetry, giving each artist twelve copies of the unbound letterpress book to work with as she pleased. Using watercolor and pencil, Meyer interpreted the specific content of the poems on each page, maintaining the same approach in each spread for all twelve books. But because each image is hand-painted, the spreads are finely nuanced and nest the verse in poignantly different ways.

Meyer's version of Fascination (several of the pages are pictured here) incorporates the loose, calligraphic line that I recognized from her paintings, but she also includes a finer pencil line that seems like a skeleton or wire armature for the fluid watercolor strokes.

Counterproofing also played a part in Meyer's process, as she pressed the wet image from one page onto the next. Meyer has had a longstanding interest in book projects, and she graciously dug through her flatfiles to show me numerous earlier projects. Among the impressive examples was a facsimile of her sketchbooks that the Mezzanine Gallery of the Metropolitan Museum of Art published in 1997.

The final page of Fascination is the colophon, which includes publishing information and signatures of both the poet and artist. The book will be available at her gallery, Lennon Weinberg, as soon as the handmade linen boxes are complete.

Note: Other artists invited to participate in the project include Regina Silveira (Brazil), Kim Sooja (South Korea), and Elena Berriolo (New York). Berriolo, who altered the book with a sewing machine, will present of her version of Fascination Wednesday, October 22, at Art Projects International.